While it can be easy to forget that we are living through history, we don’t have to remind you that 2020 was a year like no other — a pandemic halted our lives, anti-racist activism exploded onto our streets and a seemingly endless election shook our democracy. And while the outside world was transforming, Clarifi finalized major transitions including the departure of a long-term executive director, an affiliation with national non-profit GreenPath Financial Wellness, and the retiring of our inaugural service, the Debt Management Program.

From here, both excited and cautious, we began our first strategic planning effort in nearly a decade with the most basic question: what is Clarifi’s purpose? We asked that and other defining questions to our clients, partners, funders, and community stakeholders. With their answers in mind and our own ideas, we engaged in reinvigorating conversations at all levels of the organization and built draft after draft of the very plan you hold in your hands (or is reflecting on your screen).

We cannot distill all our learnings into one paragraph, but one message rang most true to us throughout this journey: Clarifi can no longer afford to operate solely as a direct service organization. If we are to make real and lasting impact in our clients’ lives, we must take action and confront the systemic barriers that keep them from achieving financial resilience. We have no illusions that we will perfect our new calling in the three years our plan describes, but what you’ll find here is our earnest attempt to start down that path. We hope you’ll walk with us and our clients — we can make it a lot further together.

Launched more than a half century ago, Clarifi is the preeminent financial capability and justice organization in Philadelphia and the Delaware Valley. Clarifi has served over 750,000 individuals since our founding, delivering people-centered counseling and education that empowers families to overcome barriers and achieve their most important financial goals.
